Description of the incident, including the suspected cause of death, injury or egregious abuse or neglect:

The infant's mother brought her to the emergency room with presenting first and second degree burns to the left buttock, blistering burns between her shoulder blades, burns on the left side of her head, right heel and calf. The mother reported that she believed the child was burned by a heat register, which was positioned next to the mattress and bed frame where the child slept with her mother. The attending physician stated that the child's injuries were consistent with the mother's description of events and not likely the result of maltreatment.

Findings by agency, including material circumstances leading to incident:

The agency unsubstantiated neglect to the child. The mother explained that she and the infant often slept together on a mattress and bed frame. In the family home, the heat registers are on the floor, and the mother had turned up the heat to 75-80 degrees to achieve adequate warmth in the room. Reportedly, the infant rolled to the edge of the bed by the heat register. She became wedged between the bed frame and mattress in direct contact with the register. A temperature reading was conducted on the heat register to assist in determining the length of time needed to incur this type of injury. A burn expert was consulted and concurred that the infant's injuries and the explanation were plausible for accidental injury. It was determined that this type of burn could have occurred in one second or less. No other concerns about the family were noted during the initial assessment. No criminal charges were filed in connection with the child's injuries.
