Privacy Protections for Child Support Participants

Would release of your address, telephone number, employer or other location information put you or your children at risk of harm?

A privacy provision in the Wisconsin child support computer system limits release of information for those at risk of harm.

You may qualify for privacy protection if you meet any of these conditions:

- You or your child are covered by a protective order.
- You or your child have a history of domestic violence or are at risk of domestic violence.
- You have reason to believe that you or your child may be physically or emotionally harmed if information were released.
- You have been granted good cause for non-cooperation with child support by a W-2 agency or another county social services agency.

If you wish to protect this information:

Contact the child support agency where your court order is filed, and ask for the “Request for Privacy Protection” form. You may request this enhanced privacy protection at any time.
